THE MAN WITHOUT A MEMORY.

BY A. W. MARCHEMONT.

(ALL RIGHTS RESERVED.)

CHAPTER VI.—Continued.

"Can you think of anyone else?" she hesitated, glancing first at me and then at Nesa.

"Do you remember the two Apeldoorn sisters, Nesa?"

"Yes, quite well, dear."

"They are Herr Feldmann's cousins," said Rosa, and then I knew what was coming. "One of them is going to be married and wants me to go to the wedding. I should have gone if it hadn't been that I heard just then about my Cousin Johann. Herr Feldmann and his sister are going, and I should have gone with them; but his sister is ill," she added, looking to see how I took it.

"It would certainly open the way to the necessary acquaintance, but how could I get hold of his permit?"

"I can't think of anything else," said Rosa as I did not answer. "But I think Herr Feldmann would do anything I asked him," she added.

"Do you mean you would tell him everything?" I asked, not at all relishing the suggestion.

"It would be necessary, wouldn't it?"

"I'd rather try to think of some other plan," I replied, and not realising my wife for some alternative, without any help, and presently she got up and walked about the drawing-room.

When she had left us, Nesa stirred uneasily, glanced once or twice at me, and then told out her hand. "I'm—I'm sorry, Jack," she whispered.

"All right, don't worry; and I just pressed her trembling fingers."

"But to talk to you as I did—all the brutal things I said. I'm so ashamed. You couldn't know, and you caught me in the very act of spying into that place there. If you hadn't found up a bit, it wouldn't have been for the sake than here, instead of thinking she was responsible for the mess."

"Poor mother," she murmured, and was silent for a while. "You've joined the army, then?" was her next question.

"I'm in the Flying Corps, and your mother didn't tell me anything about you for fear it would get on my nerves."

"Then I had something to do with your coming?" she asked, with a flicker of a flash in her brown eyes.

"I couldn't very well ease your mother's mind in London, could I? She was against the thing, but I explained there was really no risk. Of course there would not have been any if the steamer hadn't been so late, and this Lanes business turned out as it has."

"But it was I who made you tell Rosa?"

"And probably the best thing she could have done if—"

"I gestured towards Rosa, who was still pacing the room in troubled perplexity."

"I did my utmost to lead Nesa to think I took the position lightly; but I was in reality almost desperately anxious, and every moment of Rosa's indecision added to the disquieting tension of suspense. If the worst should come, I could see nothing but a mass of trouble ahead; and I was only too conscious of how big the danger to her German-disciplined mind. They all go in deadly fear of the authorities; and it was impossible to say that I was at all at ease. It could mean the prospect of a spell in prison."

"You haven't said yet that you forgive me, Jack," said Nesa presently.

"Simply because there's nothing to forgive. I should probably have done just what you did," I replied with a smile.

"Do you mean that anything I could have done would have made you take me for a spy, then?" I took you for one," she said ruefully.

"The only difference is that I might not have been quite so impatient, and have been ready to listen to your explanation and not let us worry over that. Let us think how we're going to get out of it all."

"I think Rosa will help me to get out of it."

"But this fellow, Feldmann?"

"You needn't trouble about him. He worships her, and the instant he knows her cousin is drowned and the way is clear for him, he'll be ready to—well, to do anything she wishes."

"That's good hearing, anyhow, but I wish she'd look sharp and make her mind up. Nesa laughed gently. "She's one of the kindest-hearted souls in the world."

But Rosa seemed in no hurry to come back to us, and before she could tell us her decision, the opportunity passed, for Hans came in with a man whom Nesa whispered to me was Feldmann himself.

Rosa introduced me to him as her cousin. That set me speculating whether it was an indication of her intention or merely a sign that she had not yet decided what to do, and I rather discourteously greeted him stiffly and followed.

A few words of general conversation Hoffmann drew me aside, and I had a significant proof of von Ertz's latent acquaintance with official matters. He had passed the earlier part of the day by saying that I had been in the hands of the British in the morning, and Hoffmann now brought me the note making the appointment for 10 o'clock.

"How's the memory, Lasse?"

"Pretty much the same," said I, shrugging. He had evidently abandoned all his former suspicions. I was glad to see.

"You'll find old Gratz, as we call him, a decent sort, but I'm afraid he may be a bit of a snob. He won't like me."

"Meaning?"

"Well, a man without a memory isn't much use to the Secret Service, you know, although he may be in other ways."

"I didn't like him," said I. "But I can remember all that's passed since the Burgers."

"He did not draw him, however. He just laughed. "I mustn't anticipate, of course; but I'll give you a tip. Be at his office on the 10th; he has nothing so much as punctuality."

With that, he reformed the rest, and again the conversation was about matters in which I had no interest. I studied Feldmann carefully. He was a handsome fellow, fair, blue-eyed, rather round-faced, and weak; but he had a very pleasant smile which I saw often. But not once did he address me, and his dislike and hostility were plain each time he glanced in my direction.

He certainly wasn't the man I would have chosen to trust; but he was ready to be chosen. He had to be asked with the fact that both Rosa and Nesa herself were ready to go with him.

Hoffmann did not stay long, and when he had gone Rosa reminded me about going to the tailor's, and as I was leaving the room she said to Nesa, "You might show it to Johann now, dear."

"Rosa has asked me to show you the portrait of your mother, Herr Lasse, as she hopes it will perhaps help you to remember things."

"Please do," I answered eagerly, her look telling me that this was merely an excuse; and we went to the library together.

"It's all right with Rosa," she whispered then; "but only if Herr Feldmann is told and I am to go back and tell her what you say."

"Are you quite sure of him?"

"Yes, quite, in the altered circumstances. So is Rosa."

"Carry on, then; and if there's anything wrong, let me know the moment I get back; and off I went, not letting Nesa see how it worried me to have this informal suspense kept hanging round my neck like a millstone."

HENRY GEORGE ANNIVERSARY.

The annual reunion of the supporters of Henry George was held in the Pitt-street Congregational School Hall, Alderman Charles George presiding.

Mr. D. B. Acton, in the course of an interesting address, recounted his own experiences in the western Highlands of Scotland and the campaign carried on by Henry George in that part of Scotland. His effect, he said, had been such that now no candidate was likely to be returned to the House of Commons from the western Highlands who was not a supporter of land value taxation. The speaker reverted to the work accomplished by Henry George when he visited Australia, from which might be attributed the adoption of the principle of land value taxation when Mr. George Reid was Premier and the passing of the Act dealing with local government in 1907. It was necessary to continue to progress on these lines to open up the land of the country for the use of our returned soldiers.

MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS.

The Lord Mayor, Alderman Joseph Smith, M.L.C., announced yesterday that it was his intention to contest Bligh Ward in the forthcoming municipal election. As before, he will stand as an independent.
